There's no question that World of Warcraft is the most popular online game in the world. We get reminders ever few months from Blizzard when they let us know that they added a few million new users. Yet for some reason I always get a little shocked when I see new real world software hits the MMO.

First Popcap released some of their games to the WoW but that wasn't enough for most people. Now with a new mod call TweetCraft, players can punch in their 140 character update from the old world, the Outlands and even Northrend. The client will also allow you to read tweets from others while you can send tweets and upload screenshots to twitpic. You can even have the client auto-tweet your achievements. It sounds perfect for those players that can't disconnect themselves from world to reconnect to another.
